HADDONFIELD . . .

... LOCATION . . .

The original tract of land on which this town is situated was composed of two farms, one belonging to Francis Collins and the other to Richard Mathews, each consisting of 500 acres. The part of this tract now actually occupied by the town extends from Cooper's Creek and Main Street on the northeast to Mr. Charles Hinchman's property and Main Street on the southwest; from the old Elizabeth Haddon property, now occupied and owned by Mr. Samuel Wood, on the north, to Reilley's Academy property on the south—then the site of the mansion "Mountwell" of Mr. Francis Collins.

... EARLY HISTORY . . .

Haddonfield, one of the oldest towns in Camden county, is noted for a number of incidents that occurred during the Revolutionary War. Count Donop, a Hessian officer in the British service, with twenty-five hundred Hessian veterans, crossed the Delaware River at Cooper's Ferry on October 21, 1777, and marched that evening to Haddonfield, and encamped opposite John Gill's, where now stands the residence of the late John Gill, Esq. In this house Donop had his headquarters and, although the owner was an Elder among Friends, yet the politeness of the German soldier so won upon him that he was kindly remembered ever after. The inhabitants, however, suffered much from the depredations of the common soldiers, who wantonly destroyed their property and endangered their lives. The presence of an officer in a house was a protection against them, and every family sought out one, with the promise of good entertainment without cost, that their property might be saved from destruction.

Before daylight on the morning of October 22d, the Hessians left Haddonfield, and were engaged in the battle at Red Bank, where Count Donop was wounded and taken into the Whitall residence, where he died three days after the battle, saying in his last moments, "It is finishing a noble career early; but I die the victim of my ambition, and the avarice of my sovereign. See in me the vanity of all human pride! I have shone in all the courts of Europe, and now I am dying here on the banks of the Delaware in the house of an obscure Quaker."

During the battle Mrs. Whitall was spinning in an upper room of the house. She had refused to leave it; presently a shot from one of the British vessels crashed through the wall and lodged in a partition near where she was sitting; whereupon she carefully removed her wheel to the cellar, and continued at her work until the wounded were brought to the house, and she was called upon to attend them.

After the defeat, as a detachment of Hessians approached Haddonfield, a farmer living near the road was, with his horse and cart, pressed into the service to carry some that were unable to walk further. The appearance of armed men so terrified the farmer that he neglected to fasten down the front end of his cart, and when rising a hill near the village the weight of the men was thrown on the back of the cart, and all were pitched headlong into the road.

Many Hessians deserted and became thrifty people and good citizens.

The British Army abandoning Philadelphia, June, 1778, passed through Haddonfield on the way to New York. They were four days and nights passing through the town. Lydia Bates lived in a small house on the site of Mr. George Glover's present home. She kept a cow, which was often caught and milked by the soldiers. Lydia did not like this, and when she saw them coming would drive her cow in the cellar until they were gone.

Major Simcoe, with the Queen's Rangers, a very efficient corps of Tories recruited in New York and Connecticut, occupied Haddonfield, while Stirling remained near Cooper's Ferry with a reserve. Simcoe occupied the main street with his troops, and sent detachments to destroy some barrels of tar near Timber Creek, and seize a lot of rum on the Egg Harbor road east of the village. "Mad Anthony" quickly whirled his little command down the river from Mt. Holly, and in obedience to Stirling's orders, Simcoe quitted Haddonfield by night in a storm of sleet and rain, and rejoined the reserve at Cooper's Ferry.

The next day, March 1st, a sharp skirmish ensued at the Spicer's Ferry Bridge over Cooper's Creek. The Rangers having been sent three or four miles up the direct road to Haddonfield for some remaining forage, were met by Wayne's cavalry, and forced to retreat to the Ferry. Upon the right, in the neighborhood of the present Academy and the Friends' meeting-house, a heavy fire was kept up by the Forty-second men upon the main body of the Americans, who were in the woods along the Haddonfield road. As Simcoe advanced rapidly to gain an eminence in front, the cavalry retired to the woods, except one officer, who reined back his horse, and facing the Rangers as they dashed on, slowly waved his sword for his attendants to retreat. This brave officer was Count Pulaski, who had command of the cavalry.

While Wayne was posted in Haddonfield, some of his men made a reconnoissance of the British at Gloucester, and were discovered and pursued by a superior force. A running fight ensued, which lasted nearly from Gloucester Point to the American lines, but the British suffered much the greater loss. The most prominent man in this action on the American side was Colonel Ellis, of the Gloucester militia. Soon after the whole British force at Gloucester moved on Wayne at Haddonfield by night, but found only his empty quarters. A soldier named Chew taking a shorter route and swimming his horse across Newton Creek, was the first to reach Haddonfield. Ellis' regiment marched out just as the British marched in. Colonel Ellis was so corpulent that he fell behind his men, and but for the darkness of the night would have been taken prisoner.

The intelligence brought by Chew created great fear in the town, and every precaution was taken to mislead the enemy by putting out the lights in the dwellings, and the families retiring to bed. A colored servant in the family of Mrs. Abigail Blackwood, widow of Samuel, then living on Tanner Street, was sent with the children to their room, and strictly enjoined to extinguish the candle. Through curiosity she disobeyed her mistress, and placed it on the window ledge, which attracted the attention of the soldiers who at once surrounded the house. John Blackwood, a son of the widow, then a lad, was captured, taken into the street, and made to tell what he knew of Colonel Ellis and his regiment. While attempting by the light of a few torches, and surrounded by the excited soldiers, to show the direction of the retreating troops, Miles Sage rode up and asked the boy the same question while attempting to answer the others. His reply was that they had gone some one way and some another. At this moment Sage discovered that he was in the midst of British soldiers, who at the same time noticed that he was an American. Sage at once put spurs to his horse, rode hastily into the main street and towards the northerly part of the village. He was fired upon as he vanished in the darkness, but escaped until he reached the upper hotel (the present Temperance House) where his horse was wounded, and he fell to the ground. Before Sage could disengage himself from the saddle he was attacked by the guard, stabbed in various places about his body, and left for dead in the street. By order of a Scotch officer he was carried into the small building now occupied by Mr. John Garrett, opposite the present Temperance House, where he was attended by a surgeon of the army. On examination it was found that he had thirteen bayonet wounds. He was put in the care of some women, one of whom became the mother of Governor Stratton. Being besought to prepare for death, he exclaimed: "Why, Martha, I mean to give the enemy thirteen rounds yet." He lived to tell his grandchildren of his perilous adventure.

Simcoe (British officer) had a narrow escape while halted at Haddonfield. On one occasion, while resting his horse on the brow of the hill opposite the present school for backward children, late residence of William Mann, Major Simcoe heard the whistling of a rifle ball near him, and saw two persons on the opposite hill. He ordered a lieutenant to take a few dragoons and capture them. These persons proved to be two young men who secured the loan of a rifle of a farmer living near for the purpose of hunting. As they proceeded along the road, Simcoe plainly in view, and they could not resist the temptation of shooting at a British officer. After this exploit they returned to the house, when a young woman, Diana Collins, discovered the dragoons in pursuit, and shouted to the young men to escape. One turned down the creek into the swamp and evaded the soldiers, while the other ran up the hill and secreted himself in the bushes, and but for his curiosity in watching men and horses as they passed would also have escaped. He, however, left his hiding place, went back into the road, was discovered, and after a hot chase captured. He was taken to Philadelphia, thence to the prison ships in New York, and kept for a long time. Although not the guilty one, he suffered a terrible punishment, and was not allowed to return for two or more years. But when he visited the spot where he had hidden he found his hat that had been lost in the scuffle at the time.

In March, 1778, soon after the retreat of Simcoe from Haddonfield, Pulaski with a large body of Continental troopers, came close under the British lines to reconnoitre. The enemy, anticipating his approach, placed an ambush on both sides of the road leading from the bridge to the Middle Ferry, in the neighborhood of the present Friends' meeting-house, under the command of Colonel Shaw. As Pulaski approached in advance of his men, a staunch Whig, William West, mounted a log and waved his hat as a signal of retreat. Pulaski took the hint, hastily wheeled his men and saved them from slaughter.

A young British officer made a requisition at the home of the Champions for their best horse. He got an unbroken colt, which threw him into a pond, and in revenge had his men plunder the house.

An old man, named Ellis, buried his spec'e near his house at night by the light of a lantern to save it from the marauders. The light betrayed him to the spies lurking about, and when he next visited the spot his treasure was gone.

Mrs. Annie Howell, the daughter of Mrs. Abigail Blackwood, and widow of Colonel Howell, of Fancy Hill, Gloucester County, was a child in Haddonfield during the war, and retained vivid recollections of Lafayette and Pulaski. Lafayette took great notice of her, and she never forgot him as an affable, courtly French gentleman. The jewelry she wore was her special admiration, and, when in her old age she spoke of him, she never omitted to mention this feature of his dress. She would describe Pulaski in his dragoon uniform, wearing a tightly-fitting green jacket and buckskin breeches, mounted on a superb charger, and displaying his wonderful horsemanship to the admiring soldiers.

The Haddonfield farmers formed a league for the protection of their horses and cattle. In a low, swampy piece of timber land about two miles east of the village, and familiarly known as Charleston, now a part of the farm of George C. Kay, several acres were surrounded with a strong, high fence, and there the stock was secluded when in danger. Once a man in their employ betrayed their secret, and the British seized every animal within their stockade, but in being removed the horses were stampeded and fled into the forests near Ellisburg, whence the owners subsequently rescued them.

Among those who enlisted in the service from the Haddonfield region were John Stafford, James B. Cooper, and John Mapes. Because of Stafford's stalwart figure and erect military bearing, he was selected as one of Washington's body-guard; but at the battle of Germantown he was so badly wounded that he was retired from active service. Cooper and Mapes fought in Harry Lee's Light Dragoons, and after the war the former commanded several merchant ships sailing out of Philadelphia. Mapes, we are told, settled a few miles from Haddonfield, and took much pleasure in talking about the "Old War," as he called it. His familiar salutation of "My darling fellow," whenever he met a friend, is still remembered by the people, whether it was a public gathering or by his own fireside.

Captain James B. Cooper also after the service lived at Haddonfield until his death, which occurred in the ninety-third year of his age February 5, 1854. His remains lie in the Friends' graveyard at Haddonfield, without any monument to show his last resting place.

The Continental Congress sat in Haddonfield for several weeks during the war, in the house built by Matthias Aspden, the present Temperance House. The Provincial Congress held brief sessions at Haddonfield. The Council of Safety met and held its sessions at Haddonfield in the present Temperance House. Its second session opened on May 10, 1777, and from thence until June 9 met nearly every day, and such was the press of labor upon it that it frequently held two, and sometimes three meetings daily. While it sat at Haddonfield it kept two guard-houses well filled with its prisoners, and every patriot was in some manner an amateur detective, who reported to the Council his neighbors supposed to entertain hostility to the cause of Independence. Both guard-houses are still standing; one is opposite to the place where they held their deliberations, north of the late Dr. Blackwood's residence; the other the house adjoining Mrs. Samuel C. Smith's residence, also where Captain James B. Cooper lived and died after the war.

The present Temperance House was owned and kept as a tavern during the Revolution and until 1790 by Hugh Creighton, grandfather of Governor Stratton. A frequent visitor at his house was Mrs. Doratha Todd, later known as Dolly Madison. Her father was a captain in the army during the Revolutionary War. He afterwards became a member of the Society of Friend's, and was among the first who had religious scruples about holding slaves. In 1786 he sold his estate in Virginia, and removed with his negroes to Philadelphia, where they were all freed from bondage.

Doratha married John Todd, according to the form of Friends. After John Todd's death she laid aside plainness of dress, and entered fashionable society. Her presence in Haddonfield drew around her the country beaux, and more than one, even in their old age, confessed their inability to resist her charms. James Madison, a young lawyer of talent, and even then one of the brightest intellects of his State, Virginia, fell desperately in love with her. This led to considerable gossip among the ladies and made him the point of many jokes and other pleasantries with the heads of government, even to President Washington, who appreciated his worth and abilities. Soon after she became the wife of James Madison, who some years later became the President of the United States. In her exalted position she never forgot her friends about Haddonfield, nor the many pleasant days she had spent among the people there.

A number of houses that were in Haddonfield at the time of the American Revolution are still standing, although a few have been moved to other sites. The home of the late Mary Allen, on Ellis Street, was at the time of the war on Main Street, third house, built 1750, from the present Temperance House. The house opposite Tanner Street, where Isaac Ellis now lives; the two houses opposite the Temperance House; the house now owned by Mrs. Joseph B. Tatem; the old house where Mr. Charles Haines lives; the building where the post-office and laundry now are, built in 1777; William C. Hinchman's farm house, built in 1758; the house opposite the Baptist Cemetery, also the old house adjoining Mrs. Samuel C. Smith's residence, which was a guard-house during the war, and also where Captain James B. Cooper died; and the Temperance House, 1750, are still standing.

The only drug store in the village at time of the War of Independence was on the site of the present residence of Mrs. Samuel C. Smith, and kept by Thomas Redman, who was arrested and confined in the county jail at Woodbury from January 21st to March 18, 1777. The charge was that he had read an epistle from the "Meeting of Suffering" of Philadelphia, before the Haddonfield meeting (of Friends) relating to the members of the society bearing arms. Before the magistrate he admitted the fact, yet insisted that he could not avoid the discharge of his duty, neither had he violated the law. It was claimed that certain paragraphs in the epistle were of "dangerous consequences" to the cause of the people, and he was required to give security for his good behavior in the future, or stand committed. This he could not conscientiously do, and was therefore committed to prison. He remained there until the sitting of the court, when the case was heard, and he was fined five shillings and the cost of prosecution. He informed the court, for the same reason, that he could not comply with the sentence, and was about to be remanded when the sheriff announced that the same had been discharged, and Thomas Redman was free. He never knew who that friend in disguise was, or by whom that fine was paid. The journal kept by him while incarcerated is still preserved by the family, and is an interesting manuscript.

The town was incorporated by an act of Legislature, approved March 24, 1875, and the first election was held April 6th, of the same year.

A water company was given the right of way through the borough by an ordinance passed May 5, 1886.

An electric lighting plant was given power to operate by an ordinance of the borough passed November 6, 1889.

The first trolley car was run into Haddonfield at 3.15 P.M., Friday, March 4, 1898, car No. 10, and the first car was run on the Main Street at 4.50 P.M., Saturday, October 15, 1898.

A company has been formed in the last few weeks to operate a system of sewerage.

And the Camden Gas and Lighting Company has reached Collingswood, and purpose to come to Haddonfield in the near future.

To the foregoing may be added the following prohibitions, which while not the subject of legal enactment, are recognized as binding laws of behavior by all reputable lovers of the pursuit of game and fish:—

Never violate the letter or spirit of the game laws.

Never take more fish or game than you have convenient use for.

Never be insolent or impolite to a landowner who orders you off his premise; for although he may not own the game or fish you are after, he has the right to the exclusive possession of his property.

Never fail to destroy a net or trap when you find one set.

Never shoot at a game bird except on wing.

Never kill the last quail in a covey; leave some to breed next year.

Never forget that game laws are intended to improve and increase sport, and not to prevent or restrict it.
